Letter 1:

Dear Mrs. Anderson,

I trust you're doing well. I'm reaching out with a concern regarding our history project due next Monday. I had been diligently working on it, ensuring that my research was thorough and my presentation compelling.

Unfortunately, last week, I misplaced my bag on the bus, which had all my research notes and the draft of my project. I've been trying to retrieve it with the help of the bus company, but with no luck so far. This means I have to restart my project from scratch, and this has left me quite stressed.

Given this unforeseen situation, would it be possible to get an extension of a few days for the project? I can have my mother send a note to confirm this situation if needed. I genuinely want to deliver a quality project and believe a few extra days would allow me to do so.

Thank you for your understanding.

Best regards,

Sam

Letter 2:

Dear Sam,

First, I want to acknowledge the maturity and responsibility with which you've approached this situation. Many students might simply panic, but reaching out and communicating the issue is commendable.

Losing significant work is a challenge that no student should have to endure, especially when a lot of effort has been invested. It reminds me of an instance early in my teaching career when I lost an entire semester's worth of lesson plans due to a computer crash. I understand the anxiety and frustration that comes with such situations.

Given the circumstances, I'm granting you an extension of three days. However, to maintain consistency and fairness for all students, please provide the confirmation note from a parent, as you mentioned.

In the future, consider utilizing digital backups or cloud storage for crucial assignments. It's always good to have a contingency plan in place. If you require assistance in understanding any parts of the project again, don't hesitate to approach me.

Stay strong and focused,

Take care,

Mrs. Anderson

Section F: Reading 2 (1 mark each)

The Library's Lost Legend

by Ian Daniels

Emma, Jake, and Rosa had always been an adventurous trio. Their small town of Larksville, with its cobblestone streets and historic buildings, often served as the backdrop for their escapades. Summer had arrived, painting the town in warm hues, and with it, the friends were ready to seek out a fresh adventure. This summer's goal—to explore their town's rich heritage.

- 5 The Larksville Library was an aged structure, its ivy-covered walls holding whispered tales of the town's history. This was the perfect place to begin. Its vast wooden doors creaked open to reveal towering shelves that smelled of old paper and bygone days.

- As Rosa was skimming through the history section, she stumbled upon a robust leather-bound book titled "Legends of Larksville." Out of sheer curiosity, she opened it, and to her surprise, a 10 fragile, parchment map tumbled out.

The map depicted Larksville, but it wasn't the town they knew by heart. There were ornate symbols, meandering pathways, and cryptic landmarks, all converging to a large 'X' in the heart of the town's park.

- Rosa's fingers traced the lines. "Could it be?" she murmured, eyes gleaming with excitement, "A 15 treasure map?"

Jake, ever the skeptic but always up for a challenge, smirked. "Only one way to find out."

The first step on the map showed a moon symbol and a clue: "I have two hands, but I cannot clap." Rosa instantly thought of the town's old clock tower, a majestic structure that stood tall, watching over Larksville for centuries. Its intricate hands and numbers had fascinated Rosa as a child.

- 20 The three of them rushed to the tower, barely able to catch their breath with excitement. They headed up the spiral staircase, wind whistling through the narrow gaps that looked out across each side of the city. The door at the top was locked, but next to it, they found a brass plaque with a crescent moon symbol etched into it that matched the one on their map. Beneath it read: "When day becomes night, where does everyone alight?"

- 25 Emma's eyes lit up with realization. "The town square! It's magical during the evening festivals!"

Larksville's town square was a bustling hub, especially during summer. Children chased each other, their laughter echoing, while vendors sold cotton candy and trinkets. Rosa, Emma, and Jake ran to the center of the square to the bronze statue of Mayor Elmsworth, the town's founder. They 30 were confident that he would have the answer. Sure enough, there at the base of the statue was a feather symbol. Comparing it with the symbol on their map, they moved in closer.

The writing under the statue was faded, but Jake, with his bookish knowledge, recognized the quote from Mayor Elmsworth: “Our town is unified not just by our shared history, but by the river that flows through it.” They all knew what that meant. “The ferry!” they shouted.

35 The town’s ferry had a rustic charm, with its wooden frame and red and white striped canopy. The ferryman, Mr. Higgins, was an elderly gentleman who enjoyed regaling passengers with town legends. Spotting the map, his eyes widened in recognition. “Ah, my grandmother told tales of this,” he said with a nostalgic smile. He stepped briefly into his cabin and came back with a key. Handing them the delicate key adorned with a star, he added, “She said that one day this key would reveal Larksville’s hidden treasure.”

40 With the final clue in hand, the trio made their way to the park. This park was often referred to as ‘The Treasure of Larksville.’ They felt sure they would find the star symbol here.

As they entered the park, it was starting to get late. The setting sun cast elongated shadows as they approached a grand oak tree, its branches swaying like ancient arms. There, etched on a stone embedded in the base of the tree, was the star symbol.

45 Emma’s hands trembled slightly as she inserted the key, unlocking a hidden compartment. Inside was an ornate box. But instead of gold or jewels, it held a letter and a stunning hand-drawn sketch of Larksville from what seemed like a century ago.

50 “To the brave souls who find this treasure,” the letter began, “Know that Larksville’s true wealth isn’t in riches. It’s the memories you forge, the bonds you strengthen, and the legacy you continue. This sketch is a fragment of our town’s soul. Cherish it, share it, or return it for another to find. The journey is the true prize.”

Touched by the profound wisdom, they decided to share their discovery. The sketch was framed and prominently displayed in the library. The entire town gathered to witness the unveiling, where Emma, Jake, and Rosa were celebrated not for finding a treasure but for reliving the town’s legacy.

55 Their summer quest became legendary, a testament to friendship, adventure, and the undying spirit of Larksville.
